Arizona Biltmore Resort Sale

The Arizona Biltmore Resort in Phoenix, which opened as a winter-only retreat in 1929, has sold for $403 million. The price tag on the popular vacation spot eclipsed the mark set by the sale of the Phoenician for $400 million in 2015. Blackstone Real Estate Advisors purchased the Biltmore, closing the deal April 20th, according to the Phoenix Business Journal.

The resort is part of Hilton's Waldorf Astoria collection, and the new owners plan to keep the property flagged as a Hilton property. Blackstone's hospitality holdings also include the Motel 6 chain, Las Vegas' Cosmopolitan hotel, also a part of Hilton Hotels & Resorts. The group also owns the JW Marriott Desert Ridge Resort and Spa in Phoenix, the second-largest hotel in Arizona with 950 rooms.

The Arizona Biltmore, near 24th Street and Missouri Avenue, has 740 rooms. Architect Frank Lloyd Wright consulted on the look of the resort, designed by one of his students, Albert Chase McArthur.

Built before air conditioning was common, the resort was open only during winter months. Every U.S. president from Herbert Hoover to George W. Bush has stayed at the Biltmore.

The song "White Christmas" was written by Irving Berlin while he was at the Biltmore. Ronald and Nancy Reagan spent their honeymoon at the resort.

In 2013, the Biltmore changed ownership when the Singapore government took ownership through bankruptcy court. Before then, KSL Resorts paid $335 million for the hotel in 2000. ❖

How People Kept Cool in Phoenix Before AC

Imagine having to live through an Arizona summer before air conditioning. Air conditioning only started to be widely adopted in the Valley after World War II. Before that, previous generations had to be clever about surviving a triple-digit Phoenix summer.

Beyond drinking enough water, going for a swim, keeping shades closed and hoping a monsoon would cool temps at night, they also made sure to have:

1. Houses with good air ventilation.

William Cooper, a professor at Louisiana State University, told the Boston Globe, "people with the means to do so used to construct homes that stood several feet above the ground, in order to get air circulating under the floor. They had long halls through the middle of the house, so if you opened a door at each end, you got a breeze coming through, and you'd have windows on the sides to get cross-ventilation."

2. High ceilings

More architectural features including building high ceilings to allow all of the hot air to travel to the top of the house. Most of the time, the windows would be opened near the roof to allow that air to pass through.

3. Transoms

Never heard of a transom? They are the small windows above the door that allowed the hot air to circulate to the higher levels of the house, hence the higher ceilings.

4. Evaporative cooling

People hung wet sheets outside and slept near them in a screened in porch. Guests at the Ford Hotel in Phoenix slept on the balcony while young men peddled to power overhead fans.

5. Wet sheets

People would wrap themselves in a wet sheet overnight in order to stay cooler. There were reported cases of pneumonia when this was done.

6. Direct and indirect coolers

The 1986 edition of Dr. John Watt's Evaporative Air Conditioning Handbook talks about the development of air coolers right here in Arizona. The indirect coolers allowed air to pass over water-cooled coil.

The direct coolers consisted of a wooden frame covered in wet burlap. There was a fan close by that would blow through the burlap allowing the cold air to cool the area.

7. Aspen pads

Over time, the development of the direct cooler evolved. Later it would include configuration of a two-inch excelsior (wood chip or aspen) pads sandwiched between chicken wire.

But of course, all of the techniques developed in previous generations paved the way for the air conditioning that we have today. And let's count our blessing that we don't have to endure the heat the way early Arizonans did. ❖
